Introduction

The Unicode emoji subcommittee recommends the following set of 38 characters for encoding in version 9.0 of the Unicode Standard. These symbols are considered for incorporation into Unicode for reasons such as compatibility usage, popular requests from online communities, and filling the gaps in the existing set of Unicode emoji.

For each proposed symbols, the rationale is added in the “Notes” column in the tables and there are further details in the “Discussion” section after the charts. It should be noted that the web search engine results in the “Notes” is not a definitive selection factor; it is an indicator, but may not fully reflect the potential popularity of the corresponding image among online communities.

Color images below are for illustrative purposes and are not included in all cases. Likewise halftone characters are also illustrative. A font will be supplied for characters that are approved.

Discussion

Compatibility Faces and Body

Unicode emoji subcommittee researched the existing sets of smiley symbols for major instant messaging services (Yahoo Messenger and now discontinued MSN Messenger) for the purpose of providing a mapping between existing emoji in Unicode and those symbols. Two comparison charts were prepared:

- [\[L2/15-059\]](#) Comparing Yahoo Messenger Smiley Set to Unicode Emoji
- [\[L2/15-058\]](#) Comparing MSN Messenger Smiley Set to Unicode Emoji and 10 symbols which could neither be mapped to single code points nor to a sequence of emoji, were added to this proposal.

Other Faces and Body

iDiversicons proposed emoji in document L2/14-282. The emoji subcommittee reviewed this proposal and recommends encoding six (6) of these additions -- call me hand, high five, fist bump, hand shake, cross-fingers, and clinking glasses.

People

To address unpaired gender specific emoji, iDiversicons and the emoji subcommittee proposed gender counterparts in document L2/15-048. For example, there is an existing emoji for princess (U+1F478), but no emoji for prince; and an existing emoji for bride (U+1F470), but no emoji for groom.

Food and Plant Items

The (mostly) food items in this table reflect many of the highest requested emoji to Apple, Google, and Emojipedia.

Animals

Animal emoji additions were proposed in document L2/14-174R2.

The emoji subcommittee reviewed this proposal and recommends encoding six (6) animal emoji -- fox face, eagle, duck, bat, shark, and owl.

Some of these animal emoji have been frequently requested, in websites suggesting emoji additions, as well as in direct requests to Unicode. Though the animal emoji additions are global, some of the requests for these are from North American sources. At present, we are not aware of similar campaigns or collected requests from elsewhere.

Some zoo top animal lists reviewed were:

For bird emoji specifically, Cornell University Lab of Ornithology was consulted. Cornell University has one of the leading ornithology education and research departments in the world. Their Lab of Ornithology has produced ebird.com with the largest source of global bird sighting and occurrence data. Additionally, they produce one of the two leading lists of birds and their systematic (much genetic) classification – The Clements Checklist of Birds of the World. The list of Cornell's Lab of Ornithology top desired bird emoji are (in order): Dove, Owl, Chicken, Eagle, Crow, Crane, Stork, Peacock, Robin or bluebird, Hummingbird, Duck, Pheasant, Magpie, Hawk, Turkey.
